Photo Courtesy: Sara Monika/Image Source/Getty Images The COVID-19 pandemic has changed the way we live our daily life, especially when it comes to how and where we are spending a lot of our time. With many of us repairing in place as states begin to strengthen block policies — and with the cold winter quickly settle in — it is sure to say that we will spend much more time in the house. This means that keeping our interior spaces feeling fresh is about to become more important than ever. And there is an easy, effective way to do it: apartment plants. This simple, easy to use for your living space can make the situation particularly better — with lasting results which, with the right TLC, will increase your mood long after the pandemic subsists. These green pots not only add color, character and cheerfulness to your home, but they can also help you purify the air you breathe and can also reduce stress levels. But with renewed quarantine measures in place, you might hesitate to run to your local garden center and fill a cart with fantastic flora. Fortunately, you can buy apartment plants online for convenient delivery right to your door, keeping your new garden effort like touch-free and COVID-safe as possible. Ready to start? Discover seven options for designing your own jungle. One of the interesting things about plants is that they have their own personalities — or at least their preferences. Different plants thrive in different conditions, so it is essential to consider several physical factors of your home before you start selecting varieties. Photo Courtesy: Westend61/Getty Images Light: This is one of the most important considerations to think about for any plant — is what plants get their energy from, after all. Some need much more light than others, and you will need to place them in different areas of your home to provide optimal light conditions so that they can thrive. Look at the light requirements for a plant before you get home to make sure you have an appropriate place for it - and remember that even plants labeled as "low light" still need their right amount of brightness. Ventilation: The plants thrive when there is a good air circulation around them — but do not like the temperature exchange that happens when they are in draft areas. During the winter, it is necessary to move plants that love light away from the windows and in a place with a full spectrum lamp that provides the brightness they need without the colder air. Humidity: The amount of water vapor in the air also plays a role as comfortable your plant will be. Many apartment plants are from tropical or subtropical areas, so they do better with higher humidity levels that imitate conditions in the regions from which they come. If the care requirements of your plant notice thatHigher moisture levels, you can delete leaves using a spray bottle to provide this additional humidity. Growing average: what your plants grow is as important as what they grow around. Some plants, such as cactus and succulents, like coarser, well-drawing terrain, while others are good with more dense potting mixture. Find out what type your plants prospects prefer, and e it at hand when it is time to repot. Before selecting your plants, walking through your home and understanding the places for them that best provide the conditions they prefer. Once you get there, follow the irrigation, fertilization and repotting instructions. These elements can make a big difference in how each plant does in your home. These climbing plants are delicate and elegant, with a beautiful vining character and large leaves, almost in the shape of a heart. Pothos are quite rigid — although they prefer a relatively high level and the duration of sunlight, they can tolerate low light areas. Complimentary photo: Jordan Lye/Moment/Getty Images In addition, while they love wet soil rather than wet or extremely dry conditions, they are tolerant of more or less water than they would like until they go without (or with too much) for too long. These plants are prolific growers, so you need to be careful that they do not get rootbound. As they grow, transplant them into larger vessels every 12-18 months if they are smaller or their roots are crossing the vase drainage holes and every two years or so if they are larger. If you like the appearance of tropical foliage and plants with a higher and less robust profile, Swiss cheese plants could be an ideal selection. Although the plant, which is native to Central America, does not present the type of holes found in a slice of Switzerland, the broad leaves are dotted with deep wedge-shaped slices that cause the fan leaves. Complimentary photo: Ksenia Solov'eva/EyeEm/Getty Images Like most types of plant Monstera, this variety can do well in lower light — but prefers brighter sunlight, indirect most of the day. It is better to abuse of this, it is a fiend of moisture, but it can acclimate at typical levels of house humidity very well if you do not remember to add humidity at intervals of two weeks that the Swiss cheese plant prefers. To keep these dramatic tropical plants healthy, plan to repot your once a year until you reach the size you want. If the green thumb is typically more on the brown side and wilted, a spider plant can only be the type you need to get some practice with care of the plant. It is highly adaptable and tolerates almost everything you can throw to it, if you forget about regular watering or is not located in the brighter sunlight, more indirect likes. In fact, spider plants are so easy to take care of this, before much, you might find that your plant is playing with minimal effort from you, which sends grassy sprouts called "spiderettes". Complimentary photo: Veena Nair/Moment/Getty Images Once you have some spiderettes that are growing strongly, you might find that you want to place web plants in other areas of your home or share them with friends. It is possible to propagate them, involving to cut the webs from the main plant and to place them, cut-side down, in soil vessels. The ferns make a statement wherever you put them, mainly because of their substantial width and long leaves, of feathery, which are called fronds, ferns are also plants that thrive in moisture, which is why they are often seen out of nature in the south, in the northwest Pacific and in other humid climates. Complimentary photo: @gardenknowhow/Twitter Bird nest ferns have similar growth requirements for most ferns, but they look a little different with full and solid leaves. The center of each plant also seems remarkably like the nest of a bird. Surprisingly, these tropical beauties can do well in colder climates, and because they grow naturally on forest, prefer filtered, indirect light. They love moisture, and tend to thrive in the bathrooms where steam provides the heat and moisture they need. This plant has solid stems of leaves that arise firmly from dirt. These dramatic tips remind the snakes ready to hit, but the snake's plant is certainly not so volatile. In fact, it is one of the top houseplant options when it comes to hardness, and can canAlmost all the conditions provided. Photo of courtesy: Pictures of Cavan through Getty Images; Kseniaâ€™s â€¦ SoloV'eva / Eyeem / Getty Images Despite its low maintenance requirements, it is better in some environments. Love to be dry between watering, and the serpent plant also prefers levels of medium light", but again, high levels and low light levels are usually good for this surprising silhouette. Furthermore, it is not in mind air on the moist side. Dry, but it will also do it most even in a wet bath like the bird's nest fern. With wide leaves that turns on top, this plant easily earns its nickname. It's not just a beautiful, solid green vining plant , but it is also extremely easy to grow. The Philodendron heart leaf is tolerant both of the high and low brightness conditions and can hang there through too little or too watered attacks. However, it prefers bright tonality and like the Its ground to remain damp (not soaked) for most of the time. Photo of courtesy: Katkami / Moment / Getty Images Once you see how you like and get your Carretaking program, you can face Anly propagate from Philodendrons heart leaf. While the plant grows, sends the sprouts as the spider plant. You can cut them, put them in water until the germat roots and stop in the soil well drained to expand your internal garden. The striped leaves of this tropical plant add color and contrast almost anywhere in your home. The Surprise of the Dracaena lemon in particular boasts surprising and sculptural leaves in a cheerful shady, so this is an ideal choice if you want something more colorful À € à, ~ "But something that doesn't make the flower. Photo Courtesy: Home Depot this Type of Dracaena is good at medium-luminous À € à, ~ "but indirect sunlight, so you would like to keep it away from windows and sliding glass doors on the southern and western sides of your home. However, you can hang transparent curtains to create softer and widespread light, lemon lemon surprise. This variety is particularly known for its purifying air quality, which helps keep things at home as fresh as possible. Keep an eye on, though: While growing bigger, it could be prone to become rootbound. If it happens, transplanted into a larger saucepan with aerated land. soil.
