List article Wikimedia The functionality of mobile devices running the Android operating system, the most widely used mobile operating system worldwide, can be extended using "applications" - specialized software designed to provide users with the means to use their devices for certain additional purposes. Such applications are compiled in the native APK file format of Android, which allows easy redistribution of applications to end users. Most applications are distributed through the Google Play Store, but there are many alternative software repositories, or application stores. Alternative application stores use the "Unknown Sources" option of Android devices to install APK files directly through the Android package manager. Main article: Google Play The Google Play Store (originally the Android Market), operated and developed by Google, serves as the official Android app store, allowing users to download applications developed with the Android software development kit (SDK) and published through Google. The store offers both free and paid applications. Applications that exploit the hardware capabilities of a device can be directed to device users with specific hardware components such as a motion sensor (for motion-dependent games) or a front camera (for online video calls). The Google Play store had over 50 billion application downloads in 2013 and reached over 2.96 million applications published in 2020. Although it is integrated into most Android devices, the Play Store is only available on certified devices under the "Android Compatibility Program". As a result, manufacturers of the so-called "Custom-ROMs", i.e. modified versions of Android, are not allowed to aggregate Google applications, the Play Store, with your software. Compatibility can be restored by installing Google applications from another source, such as OpenGApps, or using alternative application stores. Manufacturers Application Stores In addition to some manufacturers do not create certified compatible versions of Android, some manufacturers have decided to group their own application stores, applications. In addition, there are alternative stores that serve to distribute "hacked" versions of paid applications at no cost.
